Introduction

Visual art expands humane thinking, creating opportunities to deeply perceive reality and understand the world through color, shapes and images. Fine art classes from childhood develop a child's imagination, aesthetic vision and the ability to perceive the beautiful. This, in turn, has a positive effect on his spiritual development.

In modern education, fine arts lessons should include not only teaching drawing skills, but also instilling educationally significant ideas. For example, through paintings depicting national values, historical monuments, images of our great ancestors, students develop feelings of love for their homeland, national pride and respect for history. Fine arts also help to identify and develop individual abilities of students. Every child tries to express his worldview through drawing. This helps to reveal his inner feelings and attitude to life. Thus, art plays an important role not only in the aesthetic, but also in the psychological and educational sense.

Educational Potential of Fine Arts

Fine arts are a product of human thought and inner world, reflecting not only external beauty, but also the spiritual experiences and aesthetic views of the artist. Each work of art embodies a certain idea and meaning, influencing the viewer in its own way - making him think, awakening emotions, encouraging an understanding of beauty. These aspects make fine arts a powerful tool for aesthetic education.

Through fine art, the younger generation not only learns about beauty, but also about the history, culture and values of their people. Historical landscapes, national traditions, scenes from the lives of our ancestors created by artists enrich the spiritual world of young people, forming in their minds such elevated feelings as patriotism, national pride, respect for ancestors. For this reason, fine arts play an important role not only in the formation of artistic taste, but also in moral and spiritual education. Starting with preschoolers, fine arts classes for schoolchildren and students broaden their horizons, develop a creative approach, and teach them to look at life through the prism of beauty.

In conclusion, it should be said that fine art is a powerful means of education, capable of finding a direct path to the human heart, enriching it aesthetically, spiritually and morally. Thanks to it, young people not only learn about art, but also get the opportunity to identify themselves, understand their history and form their attitude to the future.

The role of fine arts in the formation of spiritual and aesthetic qualities

Spiritual education is the process of enriching the inner world of a person, forming it in the spirit of striving for goodness and kindness. Such education helps a person become a morally mature person who respects himself and others, possessing high human qualities. At the same time, aesthetic education enriches the spiritual world of a person, developing the ability to understand beauty, appreciate elegance, enjoy works of art and culture. These two areas - spiritual and aesthetic education - complement each other and together serve as an important factor in the education of a comprehensively developed personality. Fine arts play a special role in this process. Through works of art, a person begins to feel not only external beauty, but also spiritual and internal beauty. For example, in the works of Kamoliddin Behzod, the national spirit, elegant composition, and harmony of colors not only evoke aesthetic pleasure in the viewer, but also encourage him to respect his history and culture. Images, details, and artistic means of expression in his works convey the rich cultural heritage of the Uzbek people to the consciousness of the younger generation through aesthetic images.

Today, contemporary artists also actively participate in shaping the worldview, tastes and spiritual world of the younger generation through artistic expression of the themes of humanism, justice, peace and social problems. Painting serves not only as a means of visual expression, but also as a means of conveying high ideas.

Thus, along with aesthetic pleasure, spiritual uplift is also achieved through fine art. This is of great importance for the upbringing of a harmonious generation.

Analysis of Practical Aspects

Today, fine art education in schools and higher education institutions serves as an important means of not only developing artistic skills, but also the spiritual and aesthetic worldview of students. In this regard, the following practical measures are particularly relevant:

1. Analyze works of art. Students will gain knowledge about different movements, styles, and historical periods in art by studying the works of famous artists. This develops their analytical thinking and aesthetic perception.
2. Organize excursions to museums. The opportunity to see and experience works of art strengthens students' sense of historical memory, national identity, and respect for values.
3. Visiting exhibitions. By observing contemporary and classical works of art, students begin to understand the social and cultural functions of art.

As a result of this activity, students develop the following positive qualities:

- Artistic taste – understanding the difference between good and bad art, appreciating beauty.
- Creating art projects and developing artistic taste – learning and gaining experience in making aesthetic and intuitive decisions in the process of creating works of art, design or other artistic developments. Artistic taste usually consists of the following basic elements:

1. Aesthetic Decisions: Aesthetic concepts play an important role in the formation of artistic taste. Artists, designers, and architects are able to choose colors, shapes, composition, and detailing when creating their works. These decisions are often formed based on artistic intuition and experience.

2. Creativity and Innovation: Developing artistic taste requires creative thinking and discovering new approaches. New ideas and innovative styles play an important role in the formation of new artistic tastes. It is important to be open to innovation and experimentation that goes beyond simple, traditional approaches to creating projects.

3. Creativity and Culture: Artistic taste often stems from the cultural and historical context of a society. Attention to contemporary social and cultural events, world art and trends is crucial in shaping artistic decisions.

4. Experience and Reading: In the process of developing artistic taste, it is important to master the basics of art and design through a variety of experiences and exercises in various types of reading. Regular participation in creative activities and analysis of the works of other artists will accelerate this process.

5. Visual connections: Artistic taste is formed through visual analysis and observation. When creating works of art or design projects, it is important to study how elements close to the eye (colors, shapes, composition, and other visual elements) interact with each other.

6. Expression of thoughts and feelings: Artistic taste is especially focused on the ways of expressing feelings and thoughts. Art projects often bring a person's inner world, feelings and thoughts to the outside world. This forms artistic taste.

In the process of forming artistic taste, approaches may differ depending on different genres, techniques and directions of art and design. Therefore, in each project it is important to try and experiment with new styles and aesthetic solutions.

- Historical memory – respect for the cultural heritage of one's people, interest in historical figures and events.
- Commitment to values – Commitment to national and universal values, a sense of patriotism.

Conclusion

Fine arts are a powerful educational tool that leads a person to an understanding of beauty, spiritual elevation and richness of thought. Thanks to it, along with aesthetic taste, a person develops such high qualities as spiritual perfection, national pride, kindness and honesty. Therefore, special attention to fine arts in the educational process is of paramount importance for the upbringing of a comprehensively developed and enlightened generation.
